Deserted by Husband, She Casts Her Lot in New York Restaurants.

Believes Johanne Hoch, Bigamist, Was Her Husband, But She Loved Him.

NEW YORK, July 6.—Seated in the matron's room in the Jefferson Market prison, Augusta Seib, who was pros-trated by the heat at Broadway and Sixty-second street Saturday night and taken to Bellevue, where it was dis-covered that she was a woman dressed in male attire, told the remarkable story of her life and the reasons why she determined to pose as a man. According to the woman's story, her life has been filled with sorrow, because, she declared, three months after she became the bride of George Unferzagt on Doember 10, 1897, in Newark, she discovered that he was a bigamist. The authorities came to their home, arrested the young man and took him away from his girl bride, whom he had mar-ried under an assumed name.

It was because she hoped better to be able to find her husband, and because, too, she did not want to be bothered with the attentions of men when her heart was wrung with its poignant Sketch of Augusta Seib, Showing Her grief, that Augusta Seib became just as "Gus Leib," the Waiter. "Gus Seib," donned masculine attire, and came over to New York to begin a

The woman told her story with a falforing voice, and time and again her big eyes filled with tears, and she nervously clasped her thin, well-shaped hands together as she spoke.

Nothing about the woman indicated mental unbalance or other than a normal point of view. She had figured out what seemed to her the best way to time find her recreant husband.

On the other hand, "Gus Seid" said that "he" could smoke cigars, that "he" had drunk things over the bar, and that "he" had been a waiter for eighteen months in the Mariborough Hotel, and for some weeks had acted in the same capacity in the Savoy Hotel.

"I used little swear words, too, when I was a boy," she said, "but I mustn't do it any more. I am afraid you will think I am most commonplace, but do you know I just had 'to play the game' while I was at it, and I don't think any-hody ever thought that I was anything but a young man. It was something that had to be done well or not at all, and if it hadn't been for the heat that made me faint on Saturday, I would still be a boy. I wish to goodness I were. These thoughts haunted me day and night, until one day it came to me what I should do—dress as a man. That solved the problem. I could leave my little home in Newark and go to New York and become a man and nobody would know of my sorrow.

"I came here, but I could not do as I planned right away. I was too timid, dut I have a strong will, and at last I made the plunge. I had gathered up the wardrobe piece by piece, and I the relations with Venezuela.

Josiah Vose, like his father, was a scholarly man. He carried study, long after his graduation from Amherst, twenty-four years ago, to such an extreme that he injured his nervous system, and in recent years became a sufferer from insomnia. Sleeplessness alternated with sleepwalking, and the somnambulism developed until it became dangerous for the victim to go to rest without having some one at least in the next room:

But Brown did not know that. He feared that Vose, who had left his family in Newton Highland, a suburb of Boston, for the summer, would be lonelier in a hotel or club house than in the home of a friend even with the family away, so he invited the office superintendent to make use of his residence until the return of Mrs. Brown and the children. The offer was accepted, and on Wednesday the Browns gave their
